<h1 class="text-3xl mb-6">Happy Birthday, Mehek.</h1>

It still amazes me how someone I never saw, never touched, never even heard—could become so important to my heart.

But love doesn't always need faces or voices. Sometimes, it grows quietly through words, trust, and the feeling of being understood.

We met across distance, through messages and waiting, through late nights and honest conversations. I didn't know your voice, but I knew your emotions. I didn't know your face, but I knew your heart. And that was enough for me to love you for who you truly were.

There's one truth I've carried silently. You believed I cheated on you. I never did, Mehek. Not once. My loyalty never wavered, because my heart never looked anywhere else. Losing you was painful—but losing you while being misunderstood was even harder.

I miss you in small, quiet ways. In moments when I want to share a thought. In nights that feel a little longer without your messages. Even across screens, you felt close. Even in distance, you felt like home.

I'm not writing to reopen wounds or demand anything from you. I just wanted to offer honesty, gently, on a day meant to celebrate you. What we shared was real to me. And the love I felt never depended on seeing you—it lived in trust.

Wherever life has taken you now, I hope it's kind. And maybe, someday—if time softens things and truth finds its place—we might speak again, not as strangers, but as two people who once meant something real to each other.

Happy Birthday, Mehek.

I wish you peace, warmth, and a future full of light.
